

The Northern Lights, also known as the Aurora Borealis, are a natural light display predominantly seen in high-latitude regions around the Arctic. They are caused by the collision of energetic charged particles with atoms in the high-altitude atmosphere.